The shadow reflex disappears above a certain temperature, viz., the temperature above which the reconstructing reactions, already accelerated by the higher temperature, are no longer perceptibly increased in rate by shading. (The purely photolytic effects have no positive temperature coefficient.) Increased reactivity to shadows after the first few stimulations may be explained as a consequence of the photochemical equilibrium needing several shocks to get it started beyond some critical value, a sort of photochemical induction. Other features of the photic reactions of Holothuria may be accounted for in a similar manner. There is some evidence that the fluorescent pigment is itself the photo-sensitive material: it absorbs the green and blue wave lengths, the part of the spectrum which is chemically the most active and which is...
