A twelve year-old New York City boy, Michael, bonds with Gregory, a boy the same age, and his little sister, Smokey. It is July and Michael is spending the summer holiday on a cattle ranch in West Virginia with an old family friend of his mother. At the ranch the grandfather is a natural raconteur and tells the children he befriended a golden eagle at Devils Fork Mountain, and how the last two golden eagles in the Appalachian Mountains survived all odds. He reveals the flying secrets of the golden eagles which carry an important message: the ecology and the preservation of the environment. The children search for Devils Fork Mountain in vain. Michael returns to his home for the new school year with the anticipation of returning the next summer. At the beginning of the following year, he finds out the grandfather died, and his dream of spending the summer on the ranch is called off. Gregory and his family are moving to California after the school year. Two years later Michael rejoins his friend for the...
