Not illustrated. 1893 Excerpt: . . . 795: banachadee was the common form of salutation, not yet extinct, on entering a house; in Scottish Gaelic it would be beanuachaидh Dhe (the blessing of God), which in the last instance is to be derived from the Latin benedictio. Line 796: In gluntow may be suggested the Irish word cluinim (I hear); dyuy may be the Irish duine (man); drach may be the adjective dhroch (evil). It is true that this adjective invariably precedes its noun; but it is quite as true that this very blunder is frequently made by learners of the Gaelic language. The word mischy (misch in line 798) is probably Gaelic misel; the last word of line 796: doch may be read deoch (drink), which is the more probable, as drinking was in question at the banquet, comp. line 799: gif hir drink. Therefore line 796 may possibly be read: An...
