Those along the coasts of Labrador have partially embraced Christianity, under the teaching of missionaries; the rest are savages. Their houses vary in different tribes. Along the sea-shore, they are often of drift-wood; sometimes they are mere tents of skins. In winter, many of them dwell in huts built of ice. ttable product! t 7. Animals? 8 Inhabitant!t 9. The En Their dress is of skins, the whole being so loose that the people look like meal-bags inflated with wind. The chief ornament is a string of wolves teeth around the waist. The boots are so high and wide that women often carry their infants in them. The children wear fur caps, with the ears and nc: s of the animal, so that at a little distance they resemble the cubs of bears, foxes, fec. Fish and flesh, both raw and cooked, are eaten. Their chief ocoupation is hunting the seal, in which they display great courage and skill, fearlessly pursuing the animal in skin canoes upon the ruffled waters. Simple songs, blindman s-buff, skip-rope, making droll faces, and dancing with a recitation of certain words, are their chief amusements. They have no government but that of families. Their religious belief is confined to superstitions relating to spirits with whom the conjurors are believed to have intercourse. Dead bodies are buried beneath stones or ice,)ret so carelessly that the wolves dig them up, and skulls are often seen around the huts. Sledges, drawn...
